Andam Sam Veronica Opoku Ware Senior High School	E-waste is a crisis born not only out of quantity generated but also from the cocktail of toxic ingredients. However, in most developing countries less concern has been given to e-waste generation and management due to the smaller number and longer half-life of electronic goods. This study therefore sought to assess the existing e-waste management strategies; identify the effects of e-waste disposal in the society and examine the linkage among actors of e-waste disposal and management. Guided by the zero-waste theory, the study adopted the mixed approach with case study as a research design. Participant observation and interview, quantitative, structured questionnaire, semi structured interview guide were used as research instruments. Purposive sampling technique was employed to solicit information from the waste management department, service providers and manager of landfill site at Dompooase. Snowball technique was also adopted to select the required number of electronic repairers, scrap dealers, computer and photocopy service providers and second-hand electronic shop owners. The study revealed that e-waste disposal and management is not a matter of concern to the Waste Management Department. It was also realized that the activities of the actors are unregulated. Even though there is a bill for hazardous waste management, this bill should pass into law to ensure proper e-waste management. Financial, logistical challenges, hazardous working conditions, lack of proper policy to guide the activities of actors in the Metropolis were some of the challenges encountered. Consequently, the unwanted ones are disposed of improperly where some are seen on seashores, backyards, farms, garden, and so on. These electronic products contain toxics substances that are harmful to the environment and human health. It is recommended that, there should be legislation on separating waste at household and industrial levels and the bill on hazardous waste should be passed into law so that proposed projects concerning e-waste would come to reality.

Susan Jane Carson Queensland University of Technology	This paper considers narratives associated with a marine environment of the Pacific with a focus on the Coral Sea. In particular, the paper focusses on European imaginaries of the Pacific that give rise to complex social challenges and tensions that are evident in contemporary tourism cultures. The European traders, migrants, and white settlers of the Great Barrier Reef, the Torres Strait, and Oceania as well as the many diverse Aboriginal and Islander communities in these areas lived in a networked environment that was framed by difficult sea-faring, treacherous reefs and relative isolation. Given the importance of tourism to these regions today it is important to analyse key European narratives that inform Pacific engagement with tourism, narratives that are increasingly challenged by diverse communities across the Pacific. Keywords: Pacific, Australia, Great Barrier Reef, Captain James Cook, Joseph Conrad, Mary Watson, colonisation, tourism.
